Electronic polarization effects have been suggested to play an important role in proton binding to titratable residues in proteins. The calculations presented in this work represent a more physically correct model for the treatment of electrostatic contributions to p shifts in proteins.