The Queensland fruit fly, Bactrocera tryoni, contains multiple members of the hAT family of transposable elements.

Abstract

Members of the hAT transposable element family are mobile in non-host insect species and have been used as transformation vectors for insect cells. The Queensland fruit fly, Bactrocera tryoni, contains multiple members of the hAT family. The structure and distribution of these elements is described.