As part of an effort to develop biointerfaces for structure-function studies of integral membrane proteins (IMPs) a study was conducted on the membrane protein resistance of oligo(ethylene oxide) self-assembled monolayers. The monolayers exhibited low levels of resistance, suggesting potential for various applications requiring the suppression of non-specific protein adsorption.